

URC – Halle Institute for Global Research and Learning International Research Awards

The Halle Institute for Global Research and Learning has partnered with the URC to award up to eight grants, in any URC category, for individual or collaborative research with an international dimension.

Proposal Review and Selection:

Applications for joint a URC – Halle Institute International Research Award must meet all of the general eligibility criteria for URC funding and will be evaluated by one of the existing URC subcommittees. To be considered for a URC – Halle Institute International Research Award, applicants should check the box in the URC application submission portal indicating that their proposal involves international research. Applications deemed ineligible for this award will be considered for general URC funding.

Applications that receive strong evaluations from the appropriate URC subcommittee and meet the following criteria will be forwarded to the Vice Provost for Strategic Research Initiatives and the Director of the Halle Institute for Global Research and Learning for final review.

- The proposed research must include a significant (if not complete) focus on work conducted outside of the United States.
- The proposed research must include significant research time outside of the United States.
- The URC will not fund more than two international airfares between Atlanta and research sites.
- Travel between international research sites is eligible and must be explained clearly in the budget.
- Research involving collaboration (broadly defined) with an international partner (individual and/or institutional) is strongly encouraged. Applications should include a statement describing the collaboration, a letter of invitation, and an indication of how the research in progress will be shared across academic communities. Partner institutions (or institutions where the partner is located) include but are not limited to universities, research centers, archives, libraries, laboratories and/or government agencies.
- Projects that include research (including in comparative perspective) related to one of Emory University's strategic country initiatives (Brazil, China, Ethiopia, Korea, and India) are encouraged.
- Collaborative projects that are multi-disciplinary, or include colleagues from multiple schools, are encouraged.

Publicity – Information about grants awarded under this program will be posted on the Halle Institute for Global Research and Learning website. Applicants must agree to credit URC and Halle Institute for Global Research and Learning in any publications, conference presentations, grant applications, and/or intellectual property applications that result from awards.
